

"To me?" I said in surprise. "Then, is your mistress Miss Pace?"

"Yes, ma'am. She is ill—she does not go out. She has seen you often from her window, and she has the wish that you will call upon her. She begs that you will excuse the informality of the request. Will you follow me?"

That the quadroon had been well brought up and educated was evident from her speech. I was startled enough, but I experienced a certain pleasure at hearing these words. In a moment I was going up the stairs of the house I had watched so much. The servant threw open the door of her mistress' sitting-room and said:

"Here is the lady, Miss Sidonic."

By the grate, in a deep velvet lounging-chair, sat the woman whom I had already become so interested. I was conscious of a heavy scent of roses in the room, and I saw that there were roses on the shelves, the brackets, and the table.

The light from the window fell full upon Sidonic Pace as she rose and came forward to me. She wore a plain trailing robe of blue velvet. Her hair was pushed loosely back from her forehead, which was low and broad. Her eyes were grey, her eyelashes and brows were black. Her mouth was perhaps too large, but exquisitely full and red. In the contour of her lower jaw I fancied I saw the indication of the strength, determination, and insistence of her character. It is easy to check off an inventory of features, entirely impossible to put in words that something which gives attractiveness or ugliness beyond anything that mere features can do.

Telegraphic communication between Europe and America is promised shortly at a cost of little more than double the present rate from London to Paris. The cable, to be constructed solely at the expense of Messrs. Mackay and Bennett is to reduce the price to about a shilling a word.
